I believe, I'd like to suggest a few things. I am concerned from the standpoint of the body as it begins the cooperative walk with another branch of government where we have a new Governor, and he, in his enthusiasm and leadership and creativity, offered us a proposal which has been privately and publicly discussed, which cannot seem to come to this floor and be discussed, and all I do is respectfully implore those who can effect it to give us a chance for the discussion. The Governor is elected by all the people, those who vote for him. In accordance with the process it's majority rule and it's statewide. I believe some of the most interesting and worthwhile things I've ever participated in this body have been long, extended debates on difficult subjects, even running into the evening. And we've got half a session left, and we can take the time to treat a new Governor's new idea respectfully. We can accommodate the discussion, the debate and the result. Doesn't mean we have to adopt it. I'd implore someone to be creative, find a way to bring it out with a sunset in two weeks. But let the people of the state not perceive that we were not willing to talk about something that their new Governor and our new Governor suggested. I experience the same frustration, and rather than having a whole bunch of little gossip conversations, I think sometimes we should discuss these things right here and now in the full light of day. It's difficult sometimes, I understand, for those of you not from Omaha, to deal with us. We at times can appear to be and be perceived as some sort of a self-sufficient, affluent maybe, city-state, able to go our own way. If we didn't engage in so many civil and gorilla wars among ourselves, you might even have to pay more attention to us. But I have...if you don't...if you love to hate Omaha, and if you don't...and I know you don't, I'm engaging a little oratorical flourish here. But if you love to hate Omaha, and if you like to think about the people on 413, and you love to hate 'em, even though you beat 'em, that war is over, you won, my neighbors and my constituents care about an arena. And if they don't care about an arena, they care about a convention center. You know and somewhere short of just an absolute stonewall, that might be something that we'd like to discuss and debate. I know there are other locals that have talked about their need, not for an arena, but for a convention center. So all I'm saying is that here we are and we're accommodating, we're going to accommodate our schools. Good.
